

And just how did Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-KY) end up with a Byzantine halo over his head? By calling out a President from his own party, and telling him what is expected of him (and doing it politely, of course, using his inside voice):

I think that the handwriting is on the wall that we're going in a different direction in the fall, and I expect the President to lead it... In other words, I think he himself has certainly indicated he's not happy with where we are, and I think we are looking for a new direction in the fall.
