Across the courtyard I spied her Her red mane of hair falling across broad shoulders She stood before the stove Her over-sized Tee shirt slipping off her right shoulder and riding, enticingly, up her left hip She was oblivious to any onlooker as she dipped her fingers into the pot she pulled up a big bundle of "straw and hay" as the Italians would have it. A great fistful of pasta, and then threw her head back; that great red mane of hers flowing down She dropped the pasta into her mouth I longed, in that moment, to be that pasta to have that final moment to know where I would go to go into her throat I still miss that now