

For those of you who've grown curious at the silence, I am now in Prague, having arrived here Sunday evening via train from Berlin.

The train ride was lovely, mostly along the Elbe, and I have some out-the-window photos to post of that.

We got in late Sunday afternoon, greeted by a cold, spitting rain, but the flat is lovely & warm. It's in the Old Jewish Quarter, and both picturesque and convenient. More on that to come, too.

I spent the last two days, Monday & Tuesday, locked up in training (the real reason for this trip) in hotel meeting rooms, virtually from dawn to dusk. So, today, Wednesday, is really the first day I've had to enjoy Prague, and the weather cooperated with beautiful sunshine from about noon until 4pm. A little bit of bright joy. I took advantage of that and took a tram along the Vltava, walked about on the west bank for a while, had late lunch and then took a tram back up the east bank and back home.

Great food discoveries on this trip include Meda snacks, by Canto, which are light and airy and no doubt terrible for you, but so yummy and addictive. Also, there's that amazing smoked string cheese, korbáčiky. It's thin as a whip and knotted into little bundles.

Yum!!

Many more photos and stories to follow. Just wanted to get in touch from:

Pra|ha
Pra|gue
Pra|ga
Pra|g